The Gospel begins with the question of divorce. Many of the rabbis at the time of Jesus were interpreting the law to make it as easy as possible for a man to divorce his wife. (Wives were not permitted to divorce their husbands.) They could be divorced for something as trivial as burning a meal.

Jesus rejected this tendency as an abuse. He was trying to protect women from exploitation, but, as we see in this reading, he was also trying to protect the sanctity of the bonds of marriage.

He taught that God intended man and woman to become one flesh. Given this, how could they possibly separate from each other and divorce?

It is absolutely clear that Jesus condemned divorce. We see his condemnation in the Synoptic Gospels (twice in Matthew and also in First Corinthians).

This is not something the church made up later, as some would argue, but something about which Jesus was adamant.

However, sometimes two good people are not good for each other and the union is death dealing, not life-giving. God wants life-giving unions.
